through the film. But the "historical" problem is more apparent than real. Its characters' lives are also affected by a very real political backdrop. Nigeria has a long history of English colonialism and oppression – it was one of the British for more a hundred and fifty years, and its language groups were brought together as a single unit because of British colonialism – and it still has a long way to go to get out of it. In 1962, Papa is described as a "colonial product" – a man who has brought into the continent modernity. Though he is Nigerian, Papa believes that white people do everything better and has made everything in his life be Western and modern. He speaks in an affected British accent when talking to other people, and usually speaking the native language of Igbo whenever possible.
