But instead of being dismayed I looked at this process with the same type of interest that I could have found in reading a book. And I knew I was right, that one day it would slow down and took its normal course. The people who knew me at seventeen, when I went to France, were surprised when they saw me again two years later, at nineteen. And I have always kept the new face I had then. It was my face. It is still aged, of course, but less, comparatively, than otherwise it would have done. It is marked with deep and dry wrinkles, the skin is cracked. But my face did not collapse, as some with excellent characteristics have done. The same contours is kept, but its substance has been laid waste, I have a face thrown waste. So, I'm fifteen and a half. It is on a ferry that crosses the Mekong river. The images last to the end. They are fifteen and a half, there are no seasons in that part of the world, we only have the season, warm, monotonous, we are in the long hot belt of the earth, without spring, without renewal. I'm in a Saigon state boarding school, eat and sleep there (I go to lessons the French high school). My mother is a teacher and she wants her girl to have secondary education, à l'européenne up to the high school. This was enough for her, her son for her daughter. High school and then a good degree in mathematics. It was a very good idea, because the French high school was the best, the most modern, the greatest for their children, planned after the American model.
